It appeared to be an intriguing experience to observe the procession of beatnik women as they moved from one coffee shop to another, accompanied by a small Bohemian man who recited poorly recalled lines from E.E. Cummings.

This individual seemed to take pride in his supposed awareness of the cultural zeitgeist, confidently proclaiming that "Bird was the WORD!" as he navigated the scene.

The atmosphere promised a blend of artistic expression and casual rebellion, making it an enticing spectacle for any ordinary onlooker to come down and watch from afar.

Many of these individuals had recently arrived from towns such such as Hooterville or Columbus, having spent about a month away from their previous lives.

They took up playing the bongos and cultivated a laid-back persona reminiscent of characters with unkept Foo-Man-Cho Whiskers, complementing their war surplus attire with Foreign Legion berets.

This distinctive style was a deliberate choice, as it prompted the more conventional members of society to step aside on the sidewalk, avoiding any interaction with those they perceived as eccentric war veterans.
